The School Teacher

Miss Lambert sat at a table in the centre of the room picking her ear with a yellow pencil, with her head cocked to one side. The pupils cuffed and pinched each other and Tommy was scratching a piece of chalk underneath the desk with as innocent a face as he could hold, so that the boy who sat next to him would soil his serge trousers later on. His hand, the white chalk in it, moved slowly, curving round and round with the same motion that the yellow pencil made, as Miss Lambert twisted it round and round, her face pained, grimaced, and from time to time bore an expression of ecstatic pleasure. But the pupils knew her sudden glances, the instant stare of her large and flared-out eyes that caught them. One second she was looking out into space, and they dared to yawn, or whisper; then there were Miss Lambert's eyes. As if by instinct they knew that when she picked her ears with a sharpened pencil they were free from the quick and sudden jerks of her head that let her eyes catch them in some kind of mischief.
